Well, at least we have added a new word to our vocabulary as a result of Russia's successful launching of a man-made sattelite." The word is: Sputnik. That's Russian for whatever the sattelite is. It will likely stick as a generally used name and the device,

A "WORLD CONSCIENCE"

Those who review the activity of the United Nations, in its efforts to establish a just and lasting peace, lay most of their emphasis upon the discussions in the General Assembly, where representatives of the governments of the world express their opinions upon international subjects.

The Assembly, as everyone knows, has no power to enforce any decision but, according to the founders of the United Nations organization, it possesses a moral and spiritual force as the representative of the "conscience" of mankind. This theoritical "conscience" is supposed to lead all the peoples of the world to adopt proper attitudes toward each other as to public issues.

We do not underestimate the power of conscience, when it reflects the remorse of a human being who is conscious of disobeying divine law, but it would be a mistake to assume that there is anything like a consolidation of moral and spiritual forces in the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The conclusions of the General Assembly represent something of a compromise, worked out by representatives of various governments. Not all of these governments reflect the "conscience" of their people. When a representative happens to speak for his people, but without being able to prove it, the chances are what he says does not fit in with the conflicting "consciences" ofmankind.

To illustrate what we have in mind, let us consider the so-called "consciences" of mankind. The views and opinions of a representative of a nation like Italy, where the Catholic Church predominates, would not coincide with the "conscience" of a nation where the Protestants constitute a majority. And if the two branches of Christianity happen to agree and their representatives express what might seem to be a "Christian conscience," there might not be agreement of "conscience" with the representatives of nations dominated by other religions, such as Islam, Buddhism, Confucianism and other religions which have won and retain the faith of great masses of human beings.

FARM PONDS VALUABLE

Those who watch with interest the development of things agricultural report that thousands of farmers in the United States have turned to the use of farm ponds.

The ponds often represent nothing more than a dammed-up creek or a natural or man-made depression that catches and stores water. Some are small and relatively simple. Others cover acres and have intricate spillways.

It is quite possible that many farmers have overlooked the possibility of creating a water reservoir on their land. It ought to be possible to impound water and use it to irrigate a limited acreage. In all cases, if the pond is large enough, the owner has a chance to create a supply of water for livestock, and have the benefit of a fish crop, with recreational las well as monetary value.

Building of farm ponds have been a great thing in Appomatto; County in recent years. And now farmers from neighboring areas are visiting Appomattox periodically to see what has been accomplished in this field. We commend the leaders and the individual farmers for their progressive work.

ADVERTISING MAKES BUSINESS

Whether one realizes it or not, advertising is perhaps the most wonderful development of the modern commercial age. It is the maker or breaker of business, big or little. It is the one factor of successful sales that is most apt to be overlooked by the merchants and business men of small towns and cities.

Advertising is not the exclusive weapon of big business; it is the power that will make little concerns grow into larger success. It is a science that requires study and, be it said, character. It cannot succeed if it is based upon untruth; it must build upon faith and integrity.

The Times-Virginian is prepared to assist local business men with their advertising problems. The home town newspaper enables the hometown business to do the same job of selling, at proportionate cost, that the big city business employs.

A Moral Church

Lesson for October 13, 1957

THE letter of Paul to the church at Corinth shows us, so to speak, a church with the lid off. These letters were plainly not intended for publication,—that is, they were not sent out broadcast over the church at large. They were sent to the church concerned, one of Paul's problem churches.

Dr. Foreman

If Christians today sometimes think that their church would be free from its faults if only they could get the right preacher, they should remember the Apostle Paul. Even he had problem churches—almost "nothing else but."

Last week we noticed how highly Paul speaks of the church as an ideal, and yet how dark the reality sometimes was. One illustration of this was the crime at Corinth. For crime it was, right in the church, the crime of incest. The case seems to have been well known, Paul does not need to mention names. But the church had done not one thing about it. None of them had had the nerve even to speak out about this. (Were they too squeamish to mention it, or were the sinners perhaps prominent people?)

The Church Talks Morality

The church at Corinth is dead and gone long since. But we ask questions about the church of today. Is it moral? It certainly should be; the aim for every one of its members is nothing less than to be like Jesus. The church certainly talks morality. At least half an hour every week is spent listening to a serious talk which, in spite of what rambling there may be, does hold up high ideals. The Ten Commandments are posted on the wall of the Sunday school hall. Every Sunday school class is in favor of morality. You couldn't get a vote against morality in the whole place.

But does the church talk morality? Does it teach social responsibility? Does it hold up the same standards for the rich and the strong as for the poor and weak? Is the church putting its finger on the sins of our time or does it spend more energy denouncing a few simple sins than some of the bigger ones? Does the church talk morality on any higher level than (say) a luncheon club? Does the church lead the moral progress of the time, or does it do no better than to follow prevailing trends?

The Church Understands Morality

The church can see into morality, what it really means, too. The church today, at any rate,—just any church on any corner or country road— knows, or at least it has heard dozens of times, that immortal 13th chapter of I Corinthians, "—greatest of these is Love." The church knows, or has often enough been told, that love is the fulfilling of the law (Romans 13:10). Ask almost any church member what is the most important quality in the Christian life, and he will usually say "Love."

But does the church understand this? On the one hand it understands that all the law of God comes down to and is focussed in just those two commands, love God and love your neighbor. But has the church often struggled with the question, how does love work out, in business, in education, in race and industrial relations, in any of the complex areas of today's puzzling, pushing life? Is the church's understanding of love something of words more than of works?

The Church Upholds Morality

The church upholds and insists on moral standards, too. Active in civic reforms always is the Ministerial Association. But what ministers and churches do in their own circles may be something else again. In how many congregations will the church tolerate a minister if he persists in pointing out and condemning, in God's name, sins and wrongs committed generally by the members of that church? Don't congregations often muzzle their ministers, as good as telling him he must not preach about this or that "controversial" theme? And, most painful question of all: When there is known to be wrong-doing in a congregation, what are the members likely to do about it? Do they, like the Corinthians, shut their eyes and pretend not to see it? Can a church be said to uphold morality if it never does a thing to, about or with those who drag morality down?
